Andrew P. Moore, COO

It is important to understand the difference between business continuity and disaster recovery. The terms are often used interchangeably, and this creates confusion. Disaster Recovery is a reactive measure. It is the planning and use of systems after a disaster event has occurred. Business Continuity is not the same. Continuity of operations planning is a proactive measure. Business continuity plans and systems provide a guided approach to handling an emergency or failure in order to maintain a minimum level of functionality.

Andrew has led strategic and operational service delivery for IronEdge Group for more than seven years. He has been instrumental in the firm being recognized with numerous awards for high growth and customer satisfaction honors. Andrew is Lean Six Sigma certified and has a BS in Business Management from the University of Phoenix. He is the Chair of the Greater Houston Power BI User Group, recently named PUG of the month by the national chapter. IronEdge gives clients an edge by managing their technology experience. IronEdge designs, delivers and supports complex, multi-site organizations that require Governance, Risk, and Compliance solutions and value IT as an investment in their success. IronEdge delivers Business Intelligence as a service.
